

Suggested Interview Questions

1. You never come right out and say it, but are you talking about a conflict that will come to be known as World War III?
2. Titles for the war aside, what can be done now to address the issues you raise in your book?
3. In what ways exactly are Russia and China currently cooperating?
4. Why is Taiwan such an important player in this coming confrontation?
5. Similarly, if the United States does not resist China's effort to regain control of Taiwan, then does America stave off the conflict?
6. Have these three countries already traveled too far down their respective paths to fix the problem before an all out war occurs?
7. Why do you believe a nuclear offensive is inevitable in a war with China?
8. Furthermore, would a major conflict with China bring a ground war to the North American continent?
9. How does a country like North Korea factor into the equation?
10. What about India? They have a large population and nuclear technology and seem to have a good working relationship with the United States.
11. Your research includes many experts drawing similar conclusions from different perspectives: historical cycles, energy issues, cultural conflicts, etc., is there anyone out there who disagrees with these findings?
12. Does civilization ultimately need global conflicts to allow for change?
13. Is there a way for China to achieve full super power status globally without going to war with the U.S.?
14. Is it true that China could defeat us on the economic front without firing a shot as they are holding billions of our debt?
15. Most Americans do not travel out of the country on vacation let alone to work in a foreign land. Aside from the language difference, can you describe what it is like to live in Asia or the Middle East?
16. If such a conflict were to occur, what is your vision of a post-war America?
17. How will your book be received in China and Russia?
18. How would you assess the state of affairs at this very moment between the U.S. and China? The U.S. and Russia?